Public Notices are legally mandated advertisements that generate $2 billion in revenue for local print newspapers. They represent a partnership between government and media designed to keep the American public informed. That partnership is broken and Enotice is working to fix it using a combination of technological innovation and public policy.

Enotice is an early-stage startup founded by a Harvard Computer Scientist from a four-generation local news family and the team that dropped out of Harvard to start Quorum Analytics. It has been incubating at the Harvard Shorenstein Center for Media, Politics, and Public Policy but is moving to Manhattan, KS for the summer. Its advisory board includes:

- Marty Baron, Executive Editor of The Washington Post
- Nancy Gibbs, former editor of TIME and Faculty Director of the Shorenstein Center
- Nicco Mele, former publisher at the LA Times
- David Chavern, CEO of the News Media Alliance

We are looking for interns and full-time candidates who care about protecting the future of journalism and using technology to optimize broken government. Interns will play a foundational role in the company and will spend 9 weeks at the headquarters of a local media conglomerate in Manhattan, KS as Enotice prepares to launch and move to its eventual home in Washington, DC.

We have open roles in Engineering and Business Development. If you would be interested in joining the team, send a resume to seaton@enotice.io.
